

United Nations Map Educational Program

THE announcement of a meeting to be held in London in November for the purpose of establishing an educational and cultural organization of the United Nations marks one of the first definite steps taken since the San Francisco conference to implement the charter adopted there. The proposed organization will be one of the "specialized agencies" referred to in the San Francisco charter, under the provisions of which it will cooperate with the Social and Economic Council.

The fact that this council is set up as one of the major bodies of the United Nations organization indicates the increased recognition being given the fields of human activity under its supervision, including that of education. The potential value of trained educators, educational facilities, and educational techniques in building a peaceful world has been recognized, and at least a beginning is to be made on the thorny problem of getting international agreement on the aims of education and the best methods to use in achieving those aims.

In much the same way that the Dumbarton Oaks proposals preceded the United Nations Conference, a tentative plan for the structure of the educational and cultural organization has been presented by a group in London representing 20 nations. These educators have been meeting periodically during the past two years to discuss international problems in the educational and cultural fields.

The purposes of the organization, as enumerated in its proposed constitution, are "to develop and maintain mutual understanding and appre-

It is assumed that all members of the United Nations would automatically become members of the cultural and educational organization. Other nations could be elected to membership, upon recommendation by the executive board, if two-thirds of the members approved. The organization would probably consist of a conference or general body made up of representatives from all the member nations. In addition there will be an executive board of 15 persons selected by the conference from among the delegates, and a secretariat under the supervision of the Director-General, the nonvoting administrative head selected by the executive board. The organization would be supported by contributions from all the members.

Each member nation would be required to set up some sort of national commission representing cultural and educational groups within its borders. This commission would cooperate with and advise the delegates to the United Nations educational organization.

Members of the international organization will be required to report periodically on activities and developments in the educational and cultural fields in their own nations. They will be responsible for keeping the organization informed as to laws, regulations, official reports, and statistics relating to educational activities within the nations they represent.

The Draft Proposals itemize some of the means by which increased understanding among nations may be achieved. The organization would employ certain definite methods, some of which have already been put to use between nations. It would facilitate consultation among the various national leaders in educational and cultural life. It would assist the free flow of ideas and information among all peoples. It would encourage and provide for international conferences and exchange of students and teachers.

To prevent the growth of any educational doctrine like that developed by the Nazis which fostered militarism and nationalism, definite programs would be worked out and encouraged within every nation designed to use educational and cultural resources as positive forces to support international peace and security.
